When The Woke Eat Their Own: Convention Melts Down Over Identity Politics

AIRFRANCE

There are political moments so absurd, so revealing, and so unintentionally honest that they do not merely embarrass a movement -- they expose it.

The recent spectacle surrounding Canada's New Democratic Party convention was one of those moments.

What should have been a serious gathering about leadership, economic direction, national priorities, and the concerns of ordinary Canadians instead became a public meltdown over identity categories, speaking privileges, pronouns, "harm," and who deserved the microphone based on their place in the ever-expanding hierarchy of oppression.

In other words, it was not a convention. It was a perfect case study in what happens when the woke eat their own.

And for anyone still wondering where modern identity politics ultimately leads, the answer was on full display: it leads inward. It leads to fragmentation, resentment, moral vanity, and eventually total political self-destruction.

Because when a party stops organizing itself around shared principles and starts organizing itself around grievance, it does not become more compassionate. It becomes tribal. It becomes unstable. And eventually, it begins devouring itself from the inside out.

The Equity Card Farce

The most revealing p ntions are often messy. The truly reve

Delegates were given "equity cards" -- color-coded markers tied to identity categories such as race, gender, LGBTQ+ status, Indigenous status, and other "equity-seeking" classifications. These cards reportedly helped determine who would receive priority in speaking order during debate.

Pause for a moment and consider how insane that really is.

Not: Who has the strongest argument?

Not: Who has the best understanding of policy?

Not: Who has been waiting the longest?

Instead: Who ranks highest in the approved victimhood hierarchy?

That was the operating logic.

And once you accept that logic, you have already abandoned democratic equality.

Because a system like that does not treat people as citizens. It does not treat them as individuals. It does not even really treat them as fellow party members. It treats them as identity units -- political avatars whose worth is measured not by what they say, but by what demographic boxes they can check.

This is the central lie of the modern activist left: that justice can be achieved by sorting human beings into categories and assigning moral value accordingly.

But that does not create justice. It creates a caste system with progressive branding.

Who Gets to Speak -

And of course, once the party embraced that framework, the convention floor quickly turned into exactly what anyone with common sense could have predicted: a fight over who deserved to speak first and why.

Delegates were not merely discussing policy. They were publicly arguing over whether their particular combination of race, gender identity, sexuality, or "lived experience" should place them ahead of someone else in the speaking queue. One delegate reportedly complained that the system did not adequately account for their multiple "intersecting" identities.

Another insisted that certain racialized delegates deserved more space and deference because of historical trauma and social invisibility. Others argued over whether their specific "equity" status had been respected.

Think about how politically catastrophic that is.

At a time when ordinary Canadians are worried about the cost of living, housing affordability, inflation, health care backlogs, crime, and whether the middle class is being slowly suffocated, one of the country's major left-wing parties was effectively hosting a live-action seminar on micro-ranked oppression politics.

The people watching at home were not seeing competence. They were seeing a movement that no longer knows how to speak to normal people.

And perhaps the most absurd part of all was this: the room seemed shocked that the system created tension.

But of course it created tension.

If you build a political culture where recognition, legitimacy, and speaking priority are awarded through victim status, then every participant is incentivized to prove that their suffering, marginalization, or historical burden deserves more acknowledgment than the person next to them.

That is not solidarity.

That is competitive victimhood.

And competitive victimhood is a zero-sum game.

The Quiet Part They Made Loud

One of the ugliest truths exposed by the whole spectacle is the one progressives often try hardest to hide behind softer language: some people were clearly expected to speak less, defer more, and move to the back of the line because of who they were.

Let's be blunt.

The convention may not have formally announced, "White men are not allowed to talk." But the structure made something very close to that politically obvious: white men were expected to be the lowest-priority voices in the room.

That is the part defenders of this worldview always want to blur.

They will insist it is not "exclusion," only "equity." They will say it is not silencing, only "centering marginalized voices." They will claim it is not discrimination, only "making space."

But in practice, it means exactly what normal people can plainly see it means: some voices are treated as less valuable before a word is even spoken.

That is not equality. That is prejudice with activist terminology.

A white man in that environment was not being told, "Come make your case like everyone else." He was effectively being told, "Your voice carries less moral weight here. Wait. Defer. Step back. Others matter more."

And once a political m of their ideas, it has ceased to be a democ

It has become ideological theater.

This Is Where Identity Politics Always Goes

None of this is accidental. None of it is surprising. In fact, it is the perfectly logical end point of the worldview itself.

Because identity politics does not actually unite people. It temporarily groups them under a shared enemy narrative. And once that external enemy is no longer enough to hold the coalition together, the internal sorting begins.

That is why these movements eventually start cannibalizing themselves.

If moral authority comes from oppression, then everyone must prove they are oppressed enough.

If public legitimacy comes from victimhood, then every disagreement becomes a contest over who has suffered more.

If the political system teaches people that their primary identity is not citizen, worker, parent, neighbor, or even fellow human being -- but instead a bundle of demographic grievances -- then the room will eventually become a battlefield over rank.

And that is exactly what happened here.

The NDP did not simply embarrass itself. It exposed the fatal contradiction of the woke worldview: it talks endlessly about inclusion while creating systems that make mutual suspicion inevitable.

Because once everyone is trained to ask, "Whose pain counts most?", it is only a matter of time before the movement collapses under the weight of its own moral competition.

No Country Can Be Built This Way

There is a deeper lesson here that reaches far beyond one convention in Canada.

A nation cannot be held together by a permanent ranking of grievances.

A society cannot survive if every public institution becomes a tribunal for sorting people into oppressor and oppressed classes.

A political movement cannot govern if it spends more time policing language and allocating symbolic speaking privileges than addressing the real burdens crushing ordinary families.

And perhaps most importantly: a civilization cannot remain healthy if it forgets that human dignity is universal, not rationed according to ideological fashion.

That is the deepest problem with this entire worldview. It does not merely divide people politically. It trains them to see one another through suspicion, resentment, and category first.

It tells them that what unites them matters less than what separates them.

And once that becom

It is a guarantee.

That is what the NDP convention really showed the world.

Not strength.

Not compassion.

Not justice.

Not progress.

Just a movement so consumed with sorting people by identity that it can no longer even hold itself together.

And that is always how this ends.

When your politics is built on division, eventually there is no one left to divide except your own side.

And that is when the woke eat their own.
