Franklin Graham's Letter To Trump: A Message Millions Need To Hear This Easter

As millions of Christians and Jews prepare this week to observe Passover and the resurrection of Jesus, President Donald Trump chose Sunday to share a deeply personal letter he had received from Christian evangelist Franklin Graham. The letter, dated October 15, 2025, comes with a timely reminder as Easter approaches--a season when millions will flock to churches, often seeking reassurance about life, faith, and what comes after death.

Trump's decision to make this letter public is striking, not only for the political implications but for its spiritual significance. In his past comments, the president has openly wrestled with the question of salvation. Speaking to reporters on Air Force One last October, he admitted, "I think I'm not, maybe, heaven-bound. I may be in heaven right now as we fly in Air Force One." He added candidly, "I'm not sure I'm gonna be able to make heaven. But I've made life better for a lot of people."

The president's struggle reflects a common misconception: the belief that good deeds, personal achievements, or a life of prominence can guarantee eternal life. Trump reiterated this idea last August while discussing his desire to end the Russia-Ukraine war: "If I can save 7,000 people a week from being killed, I think that's a pretty-- I want to try to get to heaven if possible. I hear I'm not doing well. I hear I'm really at the bottom of the totem pole. But if I can get to heaven, this will be one of the reasons."

Franklin Graham's letter directly addresses this notion. The evangelist, son of the legendary Billy Graham, lays out the foundational truth of the Christian faith: being good is not enough. "The only One who can save us from Hell is Jesus Christ," Graham writes. "You can't save

you
she

Gra
Thu [illegible] ll-intentioned, cannot erase our failures, mistakes, or sins. The letter emphasizes that the path to eternal life is a free gift, accessible only through faith in Jesus Christ.

"God requires us to turn from our sins and, by faith, believe in our heart that Jesus came to earth, died on the cross for our sins, was buried, and God raised Him to life on the third day," Graham explains. "If you accept that by faith and invite Him to come into your heart, you ARE heaven bound, I promise you. The Bible says, 'If you confess with your mouth that Jesus is Lord and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved' (Romans 10:9)."

As we approach Easter, the timing of Graham's message is especially poignant. Easter is a season of reflection, repentance, and hope--the perfect opportunity to confront uncomfortable truths about sin and the need for a Savior. Many people, like Trump, may assume that living a "good" life is sufficient. They strive to be charitable, generous, and moral, yet fail to recognize that even their best actions cannot bridge the gap between humanity and God.

This Easter, millions will attend church services, seeking inspiration, peace, or a sense of spiritual security. Franklin Graham's letter offers exactly the clarity many need. It is a direct, uncompromising reminder that salvation is not earned--it is received. It is a message that calls for self-examination, humility, and the courage to acknowledge one's need for Jesus Christ.

Unfortunately, not every church will deliver this message. Many congregations have drifted from the traditional teachings on sin, repentance, and the exclusivity of salvation through Christ. As we report regularly, some churches now focus on self-improvement, social causes, or generalized spirituality, while sidelining the biblical truths that so many find confronting. For those who attend these services this Easter, Graham's letter serves as a sobering contrast--a clear articulation of the gospel that is often absent in modern preaching.

Trump's public sharing of the letter also provides a rare cultural moment where politics intersects with faith in a profoundly human way. It exposes the genuine struggle that even prominent figures face regarding eternal matters. It is a reminder that questions about heaven, sin, and salvation are not abstract--they are urgent, personal, and deeply consequential. By sharing Graham's counsel, Trump inadvertently amplifies a message that many Christians long to see reinforced in their communities: salvation is a gift, not a reward; faith is the key, not deeds; Jesus Christ is the only way.

As Easter approaches, Franklin Graham's letter should serve as both a guide and a challenge. It encourages Christians to reflect not only on Christ's resurrection but on the foundational truths of their faith. It urges believers to share this message with friends, family, and fellow congregants. For those who have assumed that being "good" is sufficient, the letter is a wake-up call--a reminder that eternity cannot be earned, only received.

This Easter, millions will come to churches seeking hope, purpose, and assurance. Franklin Graham's letter to President Trump is a timely reminder that the gospel is unchanging and essential: all have sinned, and all need a Savior. In a culture that often celebrates morality over faith, service over repentance, and human achievement over divine grace, this letter is a clarion call to return to the truth.

Good works are admirable. Kindness is commendable. Service is valuable. But none of these alone can reconcile the human soul with a holy God. Salvation is a gift--freely offered, freely received, and found in no one else but Jesus Christ. As this Easter season unfolds, may this message reach those who need it most.
