When The Church Starts Echoing The Very World It's Called To Transform

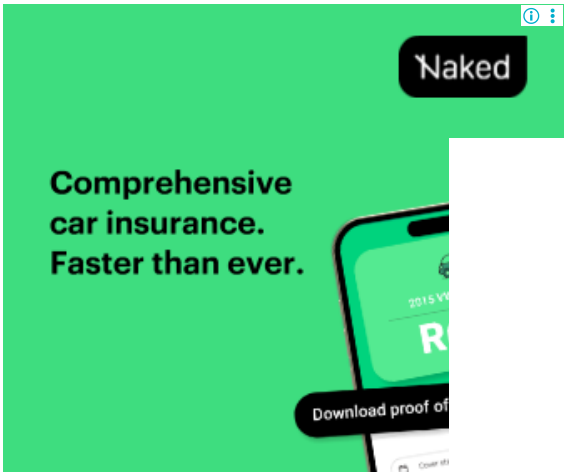
Something has gone deeply wrong when Easter--the most sacred moment in the Christian calendar--is marketed with the language and imagery of sexual innuendo.

That's not hyperbole. That's exactly what happened when the Georiga based Action Church rolled out a promotional campaign featuring a Playboy-style bunny logo paired with the phrase: "Get some action this weekend." What was likely intended to be edgy and attention-grabbing has instead ignited a wave of outrage, confusion, and, perhaps most importantly, conviction.

Because beneath the shock lies a much bigger issue--one that has been quietly growing inside the modern Church for years.

At what point did reaching the lost become indistinguishable from imitating them?



Action Church openly states it "couldn't care less about religion or traditions," positioning itself as a place where anyone--regardless of background--can belong.

An

The use of a Playboy-style bunny is not neutral. It is a symbol deeply rooted in a culture of sexualization, one that has contributed to the very brokenness the Church is meant to heal. Pairing it with suggestive language during Easter doesn't make the message more accessible--it makes it more confusing.

Even more concerning is who this message reaches.

Inside the Church today, there is a quiet epidemic that few want to talk about openly: pornography addiction. Countless men and women--many sitting in pews every Sunday--are battling cycles of shame, secrecy, and spiritual exhaustion. They are not looking for clever wordplay or edgy branding. They are looking for freedom.

And then a campaign like this appears.

What are they supposed to think?

That the Church is just another voice echoing the same temptations they're trying to escape?

Few people are more qualified to speak into this moment than Brittni De La Mora. Once one of the most recognized figures in the adult film industry, her transformation is not theoretical--it is lived. And her response to this controversy was both simple and devastatingly clear.

"When I left the adult film industry, it wasn't because a church tried to be culturally relevant," she said. "It was because I encountered the truth of God's Word."

De La Mora's story proves the opposite.

She didn't need the Church to mirror the world she was already in. She needed something different. Something holy. Something true. When she read Revelation 2:20-23, she wasn't entertained--she was convicted. And that conviction didn't push her away from God.

It drew her to Him.

"You will know the truth, and the truth will set you free" (John 8:32). That promise is not outdated. It is not ineffective. It is not in need of reinvention.

It is sufficient.

And yet, moments like this reveal a growing discomfort within parts of the Church with that very idea. Instead of standing apart, some churches are blending in--adopting the tone, imagery, and strategies of a culture that is already saturated with noise.

But here's the paradox no marketing strategy can solve: the more the Church looks like the world, the less it has to offer it.

Brittni De La Mora didn't hold back in her warning. Citing Ephesians 5:4, she reminded believers that there should be no "obscenity, foolish talk, or coarse joking." Not because God is trying to restrict joy--but because He is trying to protect what is sacred.

"Churches don't need to look like the world to reach the world," she said. "People who are lost aren't looking for more of the world... they're looking for hope. They're looking for truth."

That is the heart of this issue.

This isn't about being old-fashioned. It's not about rejecting creativity or innovation. It's about recognizing that the Gospel does not need to be dressed up in the language of temptation to be powerful.

It already is.

Easter is the declaration that death has been defeated. That sin has been conquered. That redemption is real. There is nothing dull, nothing weak, nothing irrelevant about that message.

The real danger isn't that a church tried something controversial.

It's that this is becoming normal.

When holiness is replaced with hype, when conviction is replaced with comfort, and when truth is replaced with tactics, the Church doesn't become more effective--it becomes unrecognizable.

And a Church that cannot be distinguished from the world cannot lead anyone out of it.

The lost are not searching for better marketing.

Th

The question is whether it still has the courage to tell them the truth when it does.
