The New York times recently ran a column called "The Apocalypse Goes Mainstream" asking why so many adults believe we are living in the "End Times". They tried to be polite in examining the issue but essentially suggested that those who hold to such beliefs have been brainwashed by books such as "The Late Great Planet Earth" by Hal Lindsey for the older generation and The Left Behind Series for the more recent generation.

About 40 percent of American adults believe that we are living in the "end times," according to polling. The New York Times wants to know where did that idea come from?

Despite beliefs to the contrary explored in the article, belief in the end times did not begin with modern paperbacks or 20th-century theology. It began with Scripture itself--anchored in the words of Jesus, the prophets, and the apostles. What we are witnessing today is not the rise of a fringe idea, but the reawakening of an ancient one.

1. The Words of Jesus Demand Watchfulness, Not Dismissal

In the Gospels, Jesus did not speak vaguely about the future--He gave detailed warnings about the conditions preceding His return: global conflict, deception, moral decay, and widespread fear. He described a world marked by "wars and rumors of wars," lawlessness increasing, and truth growing cold.

2. Biblical Prophecy Has a Track Record of Accuracy

Skeptics often treat prophecy as vague or symbolic guesswork. But history tells a different story. The Bible contains hundreds of fulfilled prophecies--many of them precise, specific, and historically verifiable.

From the rise and fall of empires described in the Book of Daniel to the detailed prophecies surrounding the life, death, and resurrection of Christ, Scripture has demonstrated a level of predictive consistency unmatched by any other religious text.

If past prophecies have been fulfilled with such clarity, why should future ones suddenly be dismissed as fantasy?

That's not skepticism--that's selective reasoning.

3. The Modern World Uniquely Mirrors Prophetic Conditions

For most of human history, certain biblical prophecies seemed impossible. A global economy? Instant worldwide communication? The ability to control buying and selling on a massive scale?

Today, those are not just possible--they are actively being built.

Digital currencies, biometric identification, artificial intelligence, and centralized global systems are no longer theoretical. They are here. What once sounded symbolic now reads like a literal blueprint of emerging reality.

This is not about fear--it's about recognition. The infrastructure described in prophecy is no longer distant. It is forming in real time.

Biblical prophecy repeatedly places Israel at the heart of end-times events. The fact that this small nation dominates international headlines, shapes foreign policy debates, and remains the focal point of global tension is not coincidence.

It is consistency--with Scripture.

To argue for a purely "rational" foreign policy detached from Israel's prophetic significance is to ignore the very forces shaping geopolitical reality. Whether one believes in prophecy or not, leaders across the world clearly recognize that Israel is not just another nation.

5. The Moral and Cultural Landscape Matches Prophetic Warnings

The Bible describes a time when truth would be inverted, when good would be called evil and evil good. A time when society would reject foundational truths and embrace confusion as virtue.

Look around.

The erosion of moral clarity, the celebration of what was once universally condemned, and the hostility toward faith--especially Christianity--are not isolated trends. They are defining characteristics of our age.

This isn't about nostalgia or cultural preference. It's about alignment with a prophetic description written thousands of years ago.

Rebutting the Critics

The claim that beliefs about the end times are rooted primarily in modern teachings like premillennial dispensationalism is historically incomplete. While theological frameworks have developed over time--as all fields of study do--the core concepts of Christ's return, judgment, and the culmination of history are deeply embedded in Scripture and early Christian teaching.

Early church fathers wrote extensively about the return of Christ and the final judgment. The expectation of His coming was not a fringe doctrine--it was central to the faith.

As for the idea that prophecy "re-enchants the news in a dangerous way," this argument misunderstands the role of belief. For millions, prophecy does not distort reality--it provides a framework for understanding it. It encourages vigilance, moral responsibility, and hope--not chaos.

The real danger is not that people see meaning in world events.

The real danger is a culture so committed to materialism that it refuses to see meaning at all.

A Call to Confidence, Not Apology

To those who feel dismissed, labeled, or ridiculed for believing in biblical prophecy--this moment should not weaken your faith. It should strengthen it.

Not deceived. Not uninformed. Not clinging to fantasy--but standing on a foundation that has endured for thousands of years.

The question is no longer whether people believe in the end times.

The question is why so many are beginning to see it now.

And perhaps the answer is simpler than critics would like to admit:

Because the signs are no longer subtle.
