The US Stands Alone At The UN: One Vote Against A Global Push To Redefine Women

BY HARBINGERS DAILY MARCH 13, 2026

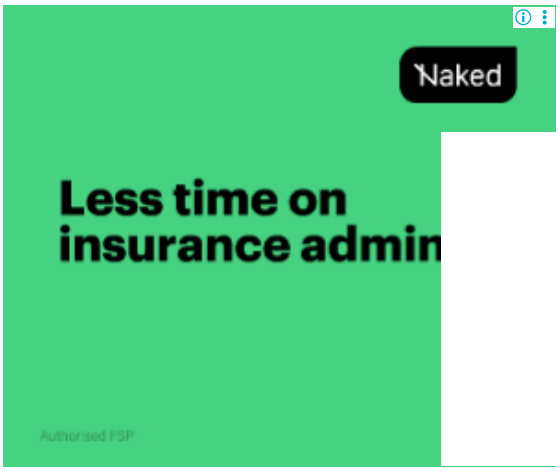
The United Nations Commission on the Status of Women kicked off its 70th session on Monday in New York, drawing delegates from around the globe. This annual meeting aims to hammer out agreed conclusions -- global policy recommendations -- on this year's priority of ensuring justice for women and girls. Yet controversy erupted right away. For the first time in decades, the document wasn't adopted by consensus but passed by a rare recorded vote: 37 in favor, one against (the United States), and six abstentions.

What made the U.S. stand alone? Trump administration officials saw the document as anything but pro-woman, slamming it for pushing DEI frameworks, gender ideology that blurs biological sex, vague references to sexual and so-called "reproductive health," and crucially, refusing to define "woman" or "gender." This omission reflects the broader cultural battles raging over gender identity, where progressive ideologies have increasingly sought to blur the lines between biological sex and LGBT-related agendas.



In recent years, these debates have intensified, pitting biological views of binary sex against a radical push to redefine reality based on subjective feelings. Critics argue that this shift undermines women's rights, safety, and achievements by allowing biological males to encroach on female-only spaces, from prisons and shelters to locker rooms and awards ceremonies.

According to Bethany Kozma, director of Global Affairs (OGA) at the Department of Health and Human Services, the U.N.'s document exemplifies this trend. She expressed disappointment in the document, saying how there was "no mention of motherhood or unique female experiences ... and it failed to define what a woman is."

As she went on to state, "The UN Commission on Women is supposed to be for women, yet for years, it's been co-opted to include men pretending to be women. Many countries claim to support and empower women, yet some of them cannot even answer the simple question: 'What is a woman?'"

Yet rather than throwing in the towel, the U.S. opted to propose some amendments -- the foremost being the suggestion that the document include a legitimate and clear definition of man and woman. Under the Trump administration, this move aligns with a broader effort to restore clarity on biological reality, reversing years of confusion sown by previous administrations. Kozma explained how the amendments "were just very common sense."

The Commission, however, appeared to see it differently. "Minutes before midnight on Sunday night," The Daily Wire reported, "the council sent the final draft to the United States without acknowledging any of the American red lines that Kozma's team had outlined."

The Daily Wire continued: "And when it came time to vote on the amendments, which were intended to be voted on separately, the council bundled all the amendments together. Some nations might have voted for one amendment but not another, and bundled together, the amendments failed. During Monday's vote, the United States was the only nation in the world to vote against the document. Six nations abstained: Côte d'Ivoire, the Democratic Republic of Congo, Egypt, Mali, Mauritania, and Saudi Arabia."

According to Kozma, this was intentional "isolation" on behalf of the council to make it appear as though the U.S. "won't defend women and girls." And yet, she told The Daily Wire, "We were the only country that was voting to protect women and girls."

This U.N. standoff comes amid growing pushback against gender ideology in other arenas, including the corporate world. Major companies, once eager to embrace progressive DEI initiatives, have begun backing away following consumer and federal backlash and financial losses. One example is the far-left Human Rights Campaign's Corporate Equality Index, where Fortune 500 participation recently plummeted 65% -- from 377 companies in 2025 to just 131 in 2026. Similarly, Pixar and Disney have dialed back some of their aggressive LGBT messaging following audience fatigue and underperformance.

The conversation also extends prominently into the sports realm, where the clash over gender identity has had real-world consequences for fairness and safety. Transgender-identifying athletes competing in women's divisions have sparked outrage, with years' worth of biological males dominating female competitions after transitioning, robbing biological women of scholarships, records, and podium spots.

As of early 2026, at least 27 states have laws or regulations that bar biological males from women's sports, and certain international sports bodies like the Olympics have faced pressure to enforce sex-based categories. The U.S. Supreme Court also recently heard oral arguments over the protection of women's and girls' sports.

In standing alone at the U.N., the U.S. not only defended women but also sent a clear message: America, at least under this administration, will not compromise on biological reality in the face of global pressure. As cultural tides continue to shift, with companies retreating and sports leagues reconsidering, this vote may mark a pivotal moment in the fight of reclaiming sanity on gender issues.
