Canada To Christian Doctors: Provide Puberty Blocker Or Be Fined Thousands

How much does it cost a doctor to say no?

In British Columbia, the answer is $28,100.

That is how much family physician Dr. Henry Ajaero has been ordered to pay after refusing to inject a 14-year-old biological boy with Lupron, a drug prescribed to suppress the child's natural puberty as part of a gender-transition pathway.

Five years later, the British Columbia Human Rights Tribunal declared that decision discriminatory and ordered him to pay $20,000 for injury to the teenager's "dignity, feelings, and self-respect." He must also pay $8,100 for the expert evidence presented against him, plus interest until the judgment is satisfied.

This is what medical conscience now looks like in Canada: obey, inject or pay.

The Doctor Who Said No

Ajaero is not some fringe activist masquerading as a physician. He has operated a family practice in Delta since 2014. He cares for nearly 2,900 patients, works five days a week, sees approximately 50 patients a day and also works Saturdays at a walk-in clinic.

His schedule is relentless. Ten-minute appointments. Hundreds of laboratory reports, specialist recommendations, prescription requests and medical forms arriving every day. At the time of the incident, he was working through the extraordinary pressures of the COVID pandemic.

Then came the appointment that would follow him for years.

In March 2021, a 14-year-old patient arrived at his clinic for a Lupron injection prescribed through a gender clinic. When Ajaero discovered why the drug was being administered, he said he could not participate. He cited his religious beliefs, cultural background and lack of experience with that area of medicine.

The tribunal acknowledged that his decision was not malicious. It accepted that he acted in good faith and that he felt unprepared and uncomfortable.

Then it punished him anyway.

Good faith was not enough. Lack of experience was not enough. His clinical concerns were not enough. His Christian conscience was not enough.

The injection came first.

A Government Tribunal Interprets Christianity

The most dangerous part of the ruling is not the money. It is the breathtaking claim of authority behind it.

The tribunal accepted that Ajaero is a sincere Christian who believes that "God created man and woman." Yet it ruled that requiring him to participate in this treatment would create only a "trivial or insubstantial" interference with his religious freedom.

A government tribunal had placed itself inside the doctor's conscience.

It did not simply determine whether he had refused the injection. That fact was never in doubt. It decided whether administering a puberty blocker as part of a gender-transition pathway should genuinely violate his Christian beliefs.

The tribunal's answer was effectively: We accept that this is your religion, but we do not accept that your religion permits you to say no.

This is religious freedom reduced to a decorative slogan. Christians may believe what the Bible teaches about male and female, but when those beliefs produce an actual moral boundary, the state reserves the right to erase it.

Faith is tolerated only while it remains silent, private and powerless.

From Physician To Functionary

The tribunal reasoned that administering the drug was merely an intramuscular injection. Specialists had prescribed the medication and were overseeing the treatment. Ajaero only needed to give the shot.

But a doctor is not an injection machine.

A prescription written by one physician does not eliminate the medical judgment or moral responsibility of another. The person holding the needle is still participating. He is still accountable for what he places into a child's body.

If physicians are free to act only when they agree with the government-approved medical consensus, they are no longer independent professionals. They are functionaries carrying out orders.

That becomes especially disturbing when the treatment itself is the subject of an international medical reckoning.

Lupron has legitimate uses and has existed for decades. But using puberty blockers to interrupt the normal development of gender-distressed children remains fiercely contested. Britain banned new prescriptions for gender dysphoria outside approved research after independent experts found inadequate evidence supporting their safety and clinical effectiveness.

One Western country examined the evidence and pulled back. British Columbia punished a doctor who would not participate.

Conscience On Trial

This ruling will not remain confined to puberty blockers.

Every Christian physician in Canada should be asking what comes next. What happens when a doctor refuses to participate in an abortion, assisted suicide, cross-sex hormone treatment or the removal of healthy organs?

Will a tribunal once again acknowledge that the doctor's beliefs are sincere, then declare that violating them would cause only a "trivial" interference?

Canada is creating a medical system in which patients possess expanding rights to demand controversial procedures while physicians possess a rapidly shrinking right to refuse them. The person requesting the intervention is treated as morally sovereign. The person expected to perform it must surrender.

Dr. Ajaero spent years building a medical practice that now serves thousands of people. He works long days in a country suffering from a severe shortage of family physicians. Yet none of that protected him when his conscience collided with gender ideology.

He would not inject a child with a puberty-blocking drug.

For saying no, Canada handed him a bill for $28,100.

And every doctor watching now knows the price of becoming the next one to refuse.
