Presbyterians Vote To Sacrifice Children On The Altar Of Gender Ideology

Comfort that moves with you

There are bad decisions. There are tragic decisions. And then there are moments when a church crosses a line so unmistakable that Christians can no longer dismiss it as merely a "theological difference."

The Presbyterian Church (USA) has now done exactly that.

By an astounding 441-30 vote, delegates overwhelmingly endorsed support for gender transition procedures and publicly opposed laws restricting these interventions--even for children. Although the final wording removed the phrase "including minors," assembly leaders immediately clarified that their support extends to people "without age limit." The message could not be clearer.

Let that sink in.

A denomination claiming to follow Jesus Christ has chosen to stand behind life-altering medical interventions that permanently alter healthy bodies--procedures that are increasingly being questioned by doctors, researchers, and governments around the world.

This is not compassion.

It is not justice.

It is not biblical love.

It is the church surrendering to an ideology that demands children become experimental subjects in the name of affirmation.

strongest warnings in Scripture against causing "these little ones" to stumble. Yet today, leaders within one of America's largest Presbyterian denominations are doing the very thing Christ warned against--encouraging a worldview that tells children they were created in the wrong body and that the answer is irreversible drugs, sterilizing hormones, and surgeries rather than the transforming power of the Gospel.

This is no longer simply theological drift.

It is open rebellion against God's created order.

The overwhelming 441-30 margin makes this even more alarming. This was not a closely divided assembly reluctantly moving in a progressive direction. It was an overwhelming declaration that biblical anthropology--the truth that God created humanity male and female--is no longer considered authoritative by the vast majority of delegates.

For decades, Christians have watched many mainline denominations slowly accommodate the culture. But accommodation has now become celebration.

The irony is difficult to ignore.

While this denomination embraces gender-transition medicine, some of the world's leading medical authorities are becoming increasingly cautious. The United Kingdom's Cass Review raised serious concerns about the evidence supporting pediatric gender medicine, while a comprehensive review commissioned by the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services likewise highlighted significant uncertainty surrounding long-term outcomes and potential harms.

Even countries once considered leaders in "gender-affirming care" have begun restricting these interventions for minors because the evidence simply is not as settled as activists once claimed.

Yet the Presbyterian Church (USA) has decided to move in precisely the opposite direction.

This isn't the church rescuing hurting children.

It is the church baptizing the latest cultural ideology and calling it Christian compassion.

Throughout Israel's history, God's people repeatedly abandoned the Lord in order to imitate the surrounding nations. Again and again they exchanged God's truth for the worship of Baal. One of the darkest expressions of Baal worship was the sacrifice of children.

No, today's culture is not placing children upon literal pagan altars. But it is increasingly asking children to bear the permanent consequences of adult ideology--encouraging irreversible medical interventions upon healthy bodies in pursuit of an ever-changing understanding of identity.

The comparison should make Christians uncomfortable.

Because the church is supposed to stand between the culture and the child--not invite the culture into the sanctuary.

Sadly, this vote does not stand alone.

Just days earlier, the denomination approved measures allowing churches and pastoral applicants to identify their positions on LGBTQ theology during the pastoral search process. Supporters describe the change as promoting transparency. But the practical effect is difficult to miss.

Faithfulness to Scripture becomes the liability.

Holding to what Christians have believed for two thousand years becomes a career obstacle.

Taken together, these decisions paint a sobering picture of where this denomination is heading. The issue is no longer whether it will accommodate progressive ideology. It already has. The next step is ensuring those who refuse to embrace that ideology are less likely to occupy its pulpits.

That should concern every Bible-believing Christian.

Scripture warned that a day would come when people would "have a form of godliness but deny its power." They would retain the language of faith while abandoning its authority.

Those words feel remarkably current.

The Presbyterian Church (USA) may continue to use Christian terminology. It may continue reciting creeds and celebrating communion. But if Scripture no longer defines truth, then what remains is little more than the appearance of Christianity without its transforming foundation.

Perhaps the saddest irony is that none of this appears to be saving the denomination.

For decades, the Presbyterian Church (USA) has experienced steep membership declines as it has moved further from historic biblical teaching. If current trends continue, it will become only a fraction of its former size within the next quarter century.

History has demonstrated something many church leaders refuse to acknowledge: churches rarely decline because they preach the Bible too boldly. They decline when they become virtually indistinguishable from the culture they are trying so desperately to impress.

People searching for cultural affirmation already have Hollywood, social media, universities, and politics.

They don't need church for that.

The church's calling has never been to echo the spirit of the age. It has been to proclaim timeless truth--even when that truth is unpopular.

Christians should pray for the faithful minority within this denomination who still believe God's Word. They now find themselves increasingly isolated as biblical conviction becomes unwelcome in the very institution that once claimed it as its foundation.

But this story is also a warning to the wider Church.

Every generation must decide whether it will stand upon the authority of Scripture or surrender to the pressure of the surrounding culture.

The Presbyterian Church (USA) has made its choice.

The 441-30 vote leaves little doubt.

Jesus warned that false teachers would arise from within, not merely from outside. He warned that wolves would come in sheep's clothing. The Apostle Paul warned of churches that would no longer endure sound doctrine but instead conform themselves to what people wanted to hear.

Those warnings no longer feel theoretical.

They feel like today's headlines.

And for the sake of the next generation, Christians cannot afford to pretend otherwise.
