Transhumanism: The Latest Attempt To Transcend The Limits Established By God

What would you think if someone told you they could instantly make you as smart as AI? What if they said they could make you immune to all diseases or could cure any of your disabilities? What if they insisted your life could be extended by tens, hundreds, or even thousands of years? Would you respond with disbelief, or do you think it would be possible? Taking it a step further... would you ever contemplate accepting such incredible offers?

I realize these claims may sound far-fetched, like something from science fiction, but they reflect the very goals pursued by transhumanists. For readers unfamiliar with the term, transhumanism means going beyond the human condition--"trans" comes from Latin and means "beyond," "across," or "on the other side of," while "human" refers to mankind. In short, transhumanism (often abbreviated as "H+") is a movement that aims to use modern technology to enhance and transform humanity.

Whether it is through genetic engineering, robotics, artificial intelligence, or future technology, the aim of transhumanism is the fundamental alteration of the human species to go beyond its current condition and become something more, something better, potentially reaching a state that could be considered "post-human." In transhumanist thought, a post-human is a being whose physical, intellectual, or psychological capacities have been enhanced so dramatically that they can no longer be considered fully human by present-day standards.

The driving belief behind these aspirations is that humanity is on the verge of acquiring the tools necessary to direct its own "evolution," overcoming limitations such as aging, disease, and a finite mind. While many of transhumanism's goals appear noble--such as curing disease and alleviating suffering--the movement ultimately raises profound questions about what it means to be human and whether mankind should seek to transcend the limits established by God.

The Ancient Desire to Be More Than Human

At first glance, these ambitions may seem modern. Yet for those familiar with Scripture, the underlying desire is not new. The aspiration to transcend human limitations and become more than what God intended for humanity echoes an older temptation. This kind of thinking sounds eerily similar to the original lie that the serpent, Satan, in the Garden of Eden spoke about the forbidden fruit, asserting that Eve "surely will not die" and that she would "be like God, knowing good and evil" (Ge. 3:4-5).

The deceptive claim in this lie was that humans could go beyond their existing created state of being, becoming like God. Of course, as practically everyone knows, this is exactly where humanity's problems began. Unlike what the serpent promised, all people have been afflicted with a corrupted nature that's hostile toward God, a predisposition to sin, and the inevitability of death resulting from "The Fall" (1 Co. 15:22).

From a biblical perspective, it is precisely these consequences of the Fall--suffering, disease, and death--that have driven humanity's desire to transcend its limitations. But rather than looking to God for solutions to these problems, the aim of transhumanism is to accomplish these objectives through human ingenuity. Rather than growing in wisdom and knowledge through the guidance of the Holy Spirit, it is believed by transhumanists that eventually human cognition and artificial intelligence could be integrated together, enabling humanity to achieve superintelligence. Instead of overcoming mortality by turning to Jesus for eternal life, transhumanists seek to extend human longevity through advancements in genetic enhancement and neurotechnology.

The Technology Behind Transhumanism

For those who may think this is purely theoretical, the reality is technologies required to achieve these transhumanist dreams are already in development today. For example, gene editing has become faster, cheaper, and more efficient because of what's known as CRISPR-Cas9 technology. This innovation utilizes an enzyme that can modify DNA at specific, targeted locations.

In doing so, genetic modification has become almost as easy as updating computer software and opens the door to unimaginable breakthroughs such as gene therapy or finding cures for diseases. Likewise, companies like Neuralink are developing implantable brain-computer interfaces (BCIs) capable of recording and decoding brain activity, which allows users to control computers and robotic devices using only their thoughts.

So, what does this mean practically? How do developments like these help overcome barriers like restricted lifespans and finite intelligence? From the standpoint of transhumanists, the question is really, how don't they help? Just imagine if someone needing an organ transplant could have one artificially grown on demand, designed to match their own genetics? Or picture a future where cancer cells could be specifically targeted and destroyed effectively curing someone of this horrible disease.

Envision a future where someone's brain could be connected to a computer and all their thoughts, memories, and knowledge could be downloaded and stored indefinitely, or even scarier still, re-uploaded into a new artificially created body? It all sounds crazy, right?! Like something out of the movie Avatar, Surrogates, or Bicentennial Man.

While these kinds of breakthroughs may sound far-fetched to some, should current trends continue, many transhumanists believe technologies once considered science fiction may eventually become possible. Scientists have already successfully grown human bladders and windpipes using patients' own cells. Brain-computer interfaces can already translate neural activity into synthetic speech, move a computer cursor, type text, browse the internet, and more. These are only some of the incredible accomplishments of technology already in existence. If this can be done now, imagine what will be possible in the next five, ten, or twenty years!

Babel Revisited: Humanity Without God

I'm reminded of God's perception of those who united to build the Tower of Babel, saying "...Behold, they are one people, and they all have the same language. And this is what they began to do, and now nothing which they purpose to do will be impossible for them" (Ge. 11:6). In other words, God suggested that humanity possesses the potential to accomplish whatever it sets its heart upon when united in purpose and effort.

The issue at Babel was not technological advancement itself. The problem was humanity's collective determination to achieve greatness independently of God. In a similar way, transhumanism often envisions a future in which mankind overcomes death, suffering, and limitation through its own ingenuity rather than through dependence upon its Creator.

Considering this, the feasibility of transhumanist goals should not be underestimated. Just as humanity collectively attempted to "reach into heaven" and "make a name" for itself in the days of Babel, ambitions of godlike knowledge and the pursuit of immortality are no different, fundamentally rooted in pride. Along these lines, if transhumanists succeed in their efforts, it opens the door to all sorts of moral and social questions, threatening the fabric of society itself.

For example, if the human species could be "enhanced" at the DNA level, at what point would it cease to be "human?" If a person's mind could be connected to a computer, would it enable the possibility for thoughts and memories to be changed, erased, or new ones implanted? Or could something like telepathy become possible for those with a brain-computer interface connected to a wireless network?

If so, could that give way to a "collective conscious" arising like "the Borg" from Star Trek? The implications for the loss of individual privacy and identity are unfathomable! What about those that would reject transhumanist technology? Would a system of inequality emerge where they are viewed as inferior as compared to those who embrace it? Again, the questions are endless.

The Biblical Answer to Humanity's Greatest Need

Of course, when faced with challenging questions, the best place to look for answers will always be the Word of God. Scripture shows us that Jesus has already presented solutions to every one of these predicaments and God's solutions will supersede man's futile attempts every time. Jesus already defeated death as demonstrated by His glorious resurrection and offers eternal life as a free gift to anyone willing to place their faith and trust in Him as Lord (Ep. 2:8).

True knowledge and wisdom have been made available by the power of His Spirit who enables believers to comprehend His Word (Jn. 16:8, 13). Aging, sickness, physical abnormalities will one day be a thing of the past knowing that new, glorified bodies await followers of Christ after they are resurrected or raptured in the future (1 Co. 15:42-44, Phil. 3:20-21).

Hope in Christ, Not Technology

Rather than placing our hope in man-made ambitions of silicon, gene-splicing, and technological self-transcendence, efforts that ultimately amount to flawed imitations of God's perfect design, we should place our faith in Jesus, who alone offers the true remedy for the devastating consequences of sin. Human attempts to overcome death, suffering, and limitation apart from God will always fall short. Scripture has already revealed the final outcome of history, and it is not a future in which mankind attains godlike intelligence or immortality through its own ingenuity. The victory has already been secured through Christ. The battle has been won. In the end, Jesus reigns victorious.

The quest for life, healing, and renewal is nothing new. Throughout the ages, mankind has sought ways to overcome suffering, reverse decay, and escape death itself. Transhumanism is simply the latest expression of those timeless desires. There is nothing wrong with seeking freedom from disease, pain, and mortality. Yearning for these demonstrates an awareness that things in our world are profoundly broken (Ro. 8:20-22). The mistake is believing that humanity can ultimately solve these problems through its own ingenuity.

Trying to hack our biology or upgrade our intellect will never cure the deeper problem of sin or enable reconciliation with God. Humanity doesn't need to redesign itself to become greater, it needs redemption through the One who is already great. The One who created us - Jesus. Instead of placing hope in the next technological breakthrough, hope should be placed in Christ alone who offers what transhumanism will never achieve: forgiveness of sin, victory over death, and the promise that one day He will make all things new.
