There was a time when Canadians would have believed that openly calling for a "Jew-free" society belonged to the darkest chapters of European history -- not modern Canada. Yet today, disturbing scenes that once would have sparked immediate national outrage are increasingly being tolerated, excused, or quietly ignored across the country.

Over the May long weekend in Toronto, the Muslim Association of Canada (MAC) -- an organization long associated with Muslim Brotherhood ideology -- held a national convention at the taxpayer-funded Enercare Centre. During a youth activism workshop titled "Visionaries of the Ummah: Youth Activism Lab," participants were asked what kind of future community they wanted to build. A live word cloud projected onto the screen displayed one deeply horrifying phrase in full public view: "Jew free."

The room reportedly contained facilitators, organizers, youth leaders, and representatives connected to the Canadian Muslim Public Affairs Council (CMPAC). Yet according to journalists who documented the event, nobody intervened. Nobody removed the phrase. Nobody publicly condemned it in the moment. It simply remained there as one of the "visions" presented to young Muslims participating in the activism workshop.

That should alarm every Canadian regardless of political affiliation, religion, or ethnicity.

That silence matters.

When hateful rhetoric toward Jews can openly appear at a large public gathering and receive no meaningful internal resistance, it signals something far deeper than a single offensive comment. It suggests that anti-Jewish hostility is becoming normalized within certain activist circles in Canada.

And unfortunately, this was not an isolated incident.

Just days later in Montreal, deeply disturbing scenes unfolded during a pro-Palestinian march when an effigy appeared hanging publicly during the demonstration. Many Jewish Canadians immediately recognized the imagery for what it resembled: intimidation, hatred, and violent symbolism directed toward Jews.

Some defenders predictably claimed people were "misinterpreting" the imagery. But history matters. Public displays involving hanging effigies, especially during periods of heightened hostility toward Jews, carry unmistakable implications. Whether intentional or not, such images evoke memories of persecution, fear, and threats of violence.

The larger problem is not merely the actions of extremists. The larger problem is the growing unwillingness of Canadian institutions to confront extremism honestly and clearly.

For years, Canadians have been told that nearly every concern about rising radicalism should simply be dismissed as "Islamophobia." Legitimate concerns about extremist rhetoric, antisemitic activism, or radical ideological movements are often shut down before serious discussion can even begin. Meanwhile, Jewish Canadians increasingly report feeling unsafe in universities, neighborhoods, synagogues, and public demonstrations.

Jew. Demonstrations increasingly feature rhetoric that would have been politically unthinkable just a decade ago.

What makes this moment especially dangerous is how quickly radical language is becoming mainstreamed among younger generations. Workshops teaching youth activism while phrases like "Jew free" remain visible are not helping young people build peaceful coexistence. They are helping normalize exclusion and hatred.

These developments also resonate with a much broader and deeply troubling pattern across parts of the Middle East. Even the so-called "moderate" Palestinian Authority has repeatedly insisted that any future Palestinian state would be entirely free of Jews. Palestinian laws already make it effectively illegal in many cases to sell land or property to Jews, with severe penalties attached to such transactions.

At the same time, history shows what often happens when radical anti-Jewish sentiment becomes embedded within society. Jewish populations that once numbered in the hundreds of thousands across Iraq, Syria, Egypt, Yemen, Libya, and other Middle Eastern nations were gradually driven out through persecution, intimidation, confiscation of property, and violence over the past century.

Yet in striking contrast, Israel continues to grant full citizenship, voting rights, representation in parliament, and legal protections to its Arab population, which numbers over two million people. That contrast exposes an uncomfortable reality many in the West increasingly refuse to acknowledge: one side openly tolerates visions of being "Jew free," while the other continues to maintain a multi-ethnic democracy despite constant conflict and security threats.

History repeatedly shows where this road can lead when societies fail to act early.

Europe offers sobering warnings. Many European nations spent years downplaying extremist rhetoric in the name of multicultural harmony, only to later face rising antisemitism, social fragmentation, violence, and growing distrust between communities. Canada now risks repeating many of the same mistakes.

A healthy democracy cannot survive if hatred toward one group becomes acceptable whenever wrapped in the language of political activism.

Canadians should also ask why taxpayer-funded venues continue hosting organizations linked to extremist ideological roots without greater scrutiny. Why are governments so quick to investigate some forms of hate while appearing hesitant when Jews are targeted? Why are police and political leaders often silent until public outrage becomes impossible to ignore?

The truth is uncomfortable but increasingly unavoidable: Jew hatred is no longer hiding quietly at society's fringes. In many cases, it is being displayed openly and publicly with growing confidence.

Canada still has time to reverse course. But that will require moral courage -- from political leaders, media organizations, religious leaders, police forces, and ordinary citizens alike.

Because once societies begin normalizing hatred against Jews, history shows the damage rarely stops there.
