Baseball Fans Erupt Over Washington Nationals' Treatment Of Christian Players

BY SUZANNE BOWDEY/WASHINGTON STAND MAY 29, 2026

The Washington Nationals might have beaten the Cleveland Guardians 6-3 on Tuesday, but that wasn't what fans were talking about. In D.C., the biggest baseball news was happening off the field, thanks to a bombshell undercover video of a team executive. In the jaw-dropping conversation, Sean Hudson, the Nats' director of Community Relations (at least for now), admitted that the franchise intentionally sidelines Christian players and stealthily tracks every visitor of Nats' park.

As part of an O'Keefe Media Group sting operation, Hudson was caught on tape spilling secrets that could land Nats' ownership in serious hot water. Describing himself as a "very far left-leaning," Hudson said that one of the team's pitchers, Trevor Williams, had been blacklisted for his faith. "He's super Christian, Catholic," Sean pointed out, explaining that last year, Williams had added his voice to the chorus of players who were outraged at the Dodgers' decision to give an award to a drag queen group called the Sisters of Perpetual Indulgence during Pride Month, despite their open hatred and mockery of the church.

In a lengthy tweet, Williams said he was "frustrated, hurt, and disappointed" by the situation. "As a devout Catholic, I am deeply troubled by the Dodgers' decision to re-invite and honor the group 'The Sisters of Perpetual Indulgence' at their Pride Night this year. ... To invite and honor a group that makes a blatant and deeply offensive mockery of my religion, and the religion of over 4 million people in Los Angeles county alone, undermines the values of respect and inclusivity that should be upheld by any organization."

ers to "reconsider th
clusive environment that does not demean or disrespect the religious beliefs of any fan or employee. I also encourage my fellow Catholics to reconsider their support of an organization that allows this type of mockery of its fans to occur."

Because he spoke out, Hudson explained, "we don't use him on social media." Even for fun promotional videos where they ask the team silly questions like, "'Is a hot dog a sandwich?' And, like, the players come up, you know what I mean? Like we don't ask him."

The video goes on to expose Hudson as a cheerleader of communism. "There is a 'Join the Communist Party' poster up in my kitchen. I would love to find ways to [fundraise for it, like] very home run is a $100 donation. That's communism, you know what I mean? That's redistributing someone's wealth," he argued. "And a lot of people will tell you when I come to a baseball game, 'I don't want to think about that s'. If you're a sports fan and we piss you off, where else are you going to go? Are you gonna drive past us from Virginia to go to Baltimore? ... Either way, I don't give a s."

Another disturbing tidbit Hudson shared is the team's commitment to spying on fans. "If you ever come to a Nats game, there is someone on our team who is responsible for figuring out everything about you ... your purchasing habits, what teams you come to when the Nats play ... and assigning you into a bucket of people and then catering content to you. So we're tracking it. If you're accepting cookies, we're getting the plethora of your Google history."

Hudson also raises eyebrows by detailing how the Nationals will host government leaders like Secretary of War Pete Hegseth and then introduce him to key contractors in hopes of kickbacks. "We're trying to use baseball to make money. And a lot of that is through defense contractors -- the Palantirs of the world. And we're essentially trying to be like, 'Look at all the Americana stuff you can do at Nats Park. Give us $2 million.' I, far too much for my liking, have met Pete Hegseth. I know he comes to Nats Park. If we can get him to meet the CEO of Boeing, then in the back of Pete's brain, like, 'Oh, Boeing, they make good stuff. We're going to pick them for a government contract.' They then pay us."

As he says, it's all about the dollars. "We're a private organization who wants to make money."

But no one is quite sure how much money the team will be making now that management has been exposed as blatantly anti-Christian, extremist, and opportunistic. Michael Casey with the O'Keefe Media Group took a spin around the ballpark on Wednesday talking to fans

ction to the story -- w
(<https://www.prophec>

"I mean, if Williams is being discriminated against for being very outspoken about his beliefs, one man said, "it's obviously not right. My beliefs are probably the same as this guy's. If he's being discriminated against for it, it's just not right." Another guy, who was obviously fired up, vented, "We are on the back of the bus. If you are outspoken in your faith or your love for your heritage, you will be put in the back, basically just like Trevor has. They will not put you up in the forefront. You'll lose your brand deals, you lose your job, you'll lose your placement and your family. Everything that we know and love is under attack in America, and they want to make it socially stigmatized."

"I believe people should be able to pray to the God that they want to be able to pray to," a man in a Nats jersey agreed. Then, of course, there's the hypocrisy, another fan pointed out. "He's persecuting somebody for being a Christian. And then you're going to [expletive] force your views like, 'I'm a communist.' Like bro, it's the same [expletive] thing. I mean, like you believe what you believe, I believe what I believe."

Sports broadcaster Jason Whitlock, who worked for ESPN and Fox Sports, isn't surprised by the toxic culture at the Nats -- and speculates that it's a lot more widespread than Washington. "They'll probably try to ignore it," he told the O'Keefe Media Group podcast about the team. "I think it's kind of difficult. The reason I'm not surprised is ... I'm an outspoken Christian. I deal with a lot of the same headwinds from the corporate sports media. You know, I'm persona non grata among a lot of these athletes that I used to not be persona non grata with," he shrugged, "but they have handlers like the guy you just exposed that tell them, 'Oh, it's just these outspoken Christians, these devout Christians, they're problematic. You're better off just staying away from them.'"

The reality is, organized sports have been "totally taken over by the secular crowd and now preaches values completely antithetical to Christianity," Whitlock underscored. "You may build your identity around, 'Hey, I'm a Washington Nationals sports fan.' Well, if you're Christian, trust me. The Washington Nationals and the employees they hired hate you and what you believe."

Imagine if the team had said, "Oh, we don't want to share a player on social media because he's Muslim or because he's Jewish or because he's black?" Alex Stein asked. "It would be the biggest story in the world." Even now, former SportsCenter host Sage Steele insists, it's a pretty "massive one." "I think it's a huge deal because Hudson has been completely exposed, and what this does depends on the potential trickle-down effect for the Washington Nationals. I mean, it could also be massive, and frankly, it should be."

Meanwhile, when Hudson was confronted about the footage, he replied, "That doesn't sound like me." And yet, in a matter of 24 hours, he deleted his LinkedIn and X accounts, then wiped his job title from Instagram. Unfortunately for the Washington Nationals, it'll be much harder to erase the outrage fans are feeling at management's obvious disdain for faith.
