The Woke Church's Latest Blasphemy: Rainbow Communion Bread

Imagine walking into church on Sunday morning. The pastor lifts the communion bread, and instead of the familiar loaf symbolizing Christ's broken body, it has been dyed in the colors of the rainbow. Before a word is preached, one of Christianity's most sacred ordinances has already become a cultural statement.

That wasn't a hypothetical.

Christ Episcopal Church in Dayton recently used rainbow-colored communion bread during a Pride celebration, explaining that the colorful bread was intended to celebrate and include its LGBTQ members.

The reaction was swift. For many Christians, the issue wasn't whether churches should welcome everyone—they should. The deeper question was whether the Lord's Table should ever become a platform for promoting any cultural or political movement, regardless of the cause.

For nearly 2,000 years, Communion has occupied a unique place in Christian worship. On the night before His crucifixion, Jesus took ordinary bread, broke it, and gave it extraordinary meaning. "This is My body, which is given for you. Do this in remembrance of Me."

From that moment forward, the bread pointed in only one direction—to the cross.

Its purpose has never been to celebrate our identity, affirm our causes, or reflect the values of the surrounding culture. It exists to proclaim the sacrifice of Jesus Christ until He comes again.

That is why this controversy reaches far beyond one church in Ohio.

Every generation faces pressure to reshape Christianity around the values of its age. Yet those changes rarely begin with someone openly rejecting Scripture. They usually begin much more subtly. A sacred symbol is reimagined. A long-held practice is given a new emphasis. A biblical truth is reframed to better fit contemporary expectations.

changes, the symbols have often already paved the way.

Throughout Scripture, God repeatedly warned Israel against adapting His worship to mirror the surrounding culture. Again and again His people attempted to blend the worship of the true God with the customs, symbols, and priorities of neighboring nations. The result was never spiritual renewal—it was compromise.

The issue here is not food coloring.

The issue is what the rainbow represents.

For decades, the rainbow has unfortunately become the universally recognized symbol of the LGBTQ movement. Using that symbol on communion bread inevitably shifts the focus from Christ's sacrifice toward a contemporary social cause. Whether intended or not, the symbolism changes the message.

Communion stops speaking exclusively about Christ and begins speaking about us.

That should concern Christians regardless of where they stand on countless political debates.

After all, if communion bread can be redesigned to celebrate Pride, what principle prevents another church from redesigning it to promote climate activism, immigration advocacy, nationalism, racial politics, or whichever cause dominates tomorrow's headlines?

Once sacred symbols become vehicles for cultural messaging, every movement eventually wants a seat at the Lord's Table.

History demonstrates just how seriously Christians have treated Communion. Entire councils, theological debates, and even martyrdoms centered on preserving the integrity of Christian worship.

They understood something our generation is in danger of forgetting: sacred things lose their meaning when we continually repurpose them to communicate something else.

Supporters of rainbow communion often argue that Jesus welcomed everyone.

That is absolutely true.

Jesus welcomed tax collectors, prostitutes, adulterers, thieves, religious hypocrites, and every other kind of sinner.

But He never confused welcome with affirmation.

Rather than calling people to surrender every area of life to Christ, some now reshape Christian teaching so people can keep those parts of life Scripture calls them to lay down. The result is a faith that becomes progressively less about dying to self and increasingly about affirming self.

Communion reminds us of exactly the opposite.

The cross confronts every one of us.

It confronts the proud, the greedy, the immoral, the dishonest, the self-righteous, and every sinner in between. No one approaches the Lord's Table because they have been affirmed. We approach because we have been forgiven.

Every believer comes carrying sins that must be confessed, desires that must be surrendered, and a Savior they desperately need.

None of us comes to Communion to celebrate our identity.

We come to lay our identity at the feet of Christ.

That includes every Christian, regardless of which temptations they struggle with. The Gospel does not single out one category of sinners while excusing another. It calls every one of us to repentance because every one of us needs redemption.

This is why the larger trend unfolding across parts of the modern church deserves careful attention.

Churches rarely abandon biblical truth in one dramatic moment. More often they slowly redefine words, reshape symbols, soften uncomfortable teachings, and gradually adjust worship until Christianity begins reflecting the culture more than it reflects Christ.

The rainbow-colored communion bread in Dayton may seem like a small gesture. But symbols have always mattered in Christianity. That is precisely why Jesus chose bread and wine in the first place. They were never arbitrary. They pointed unmistakably to His broken body and His shed blood.

The Church has a sacred responsibility to preserve that message—not update it.

Christians are called to welcome every person who walks through the church doors. We are called to love our neighbors, extend grace, and proclaim the hope of the Gospel without partiality.

But loving people does not require rewriting the symbols Christ Himself established.

The bread should remind us of His broken body.

The cup should remind us of His shed blood.

And when believers leave the Lord's Table, the image fixed in their hearts should never be the cause of the day, the politics of the moment, or the colors of a cultural movement.

It should be Calvary.

Because the Lord's Table was never designed to point us toward ourselves.

It was always meant to point us to Christ.
