Chairs flew through the air while graduates stood frozen in caps and gowns.

Parents screamed at one another in front of children who had waited years for this moment. Security guards rushed through packed stadiums trying to separate angry adults as frightened families pulled children out of the stands.

In another part of the country, even a kindergarten graduation dissolved into fighting between parents.

This is graduation week in America.

What should have been one of the happiest seasons of the year -- a celebration of achievement, growth, and hope for the future -- instead became a disturbing portrait of a nation struggling with anger, division, emotional instability, and the inability to handle even the smallest inconveniences with dignity.

Here is a Prayer You Can Pray

This Prayer has Helped Many People. Pray Today.

Across the country, viral videos captured graduation ceremonies descending into outright chaos. At several high school graduations, fights broke out in the stands while students waited to receive diplomas. In one especially shocking altercation, adults reportedly grabbed folding chairs and hurled them during a dispute over seating arrangements.

And yet this behavior is becoming increasingly common.

In another viral incident, a kindergarten graduation ceremony erupted into chaos when family members began physically fighting in front of young children. Videos showed adults shouting, pushing, and causing panic during an event that was supposed to celebrate innocent young students just beginning their educational journey.

Elsewhere, frustrations exploded after severe weather impacted ceremonies. In Tennessee, parents became outraged when heavy rain poured down during a graduation ceremony that many believed should have been postponed. Instead of unity and patience, the atmosphere quickly turned hostile and divisive as angry families lashed out online and in person.

Then came another sign of the times: artificial intelligence mishaps.

At multiple graduations nationwide, AI-assisted systems reportedly mispronounced names, skipped students entirely, or malfunctioned during ceremonies. Some graduates were denied the moment they had worked years to experience -- walking across the stage while their names were properly honored before friends and family.

Technology promised convenience. Instead, in many cases, it delivered confusion, embarrassment, and disappointment.

But perhaps even more troubling than the disorder itself is what these graduation ceremonies are increasingly becoming.

At CUNY School of Law, a graduate took center stage during commencement by unfurling a Palestinian flag while a faculty member in academic robes reportedly stepped forward to help hold it up as sections of the crowd applauded.

What are we to make of all this?

Graduation ceremonies once represented discipline, accomplishment, gratitude, and hope for the future. Families dressed up. Parents applauded every graduate, not just their own. The day was understood to be bigger than politics, bigger than personal grievances, and bigger than social media outrage.

Today, many ceremonies feel more like pressure cookers waiting to explode.

America is increasingly raising a generation in a culture where emotional control is optional, outrage is rewarded, and every public moment risks becoming ideological theater.

Even sacred milestones are no longer safe from division.

Commencements that once celebrated achievement are now often transformed into activist stages where political messaging overshadows the graduates themselves. Instead of unity, there is protest. Instead of reflection, there is confrontation. Instead of gratitude, there is grievance.

And perhaps the most sobering part of all is that much of this behavior is being modeled by adults.

Parents -- the very people meant to demonstrate maturity, patience, and self-control -- are often the ones escalating tensions. Children are watching adults scream over seating arrangements, curse at strangers, throw objects, and destroy what should have been unforgettable family memories.

What lesson does that teach the next generation?

The next generation is learning how adults respond to stress, inconvenience, disagreement, and disappointment. They are learning from what they see.

And increasingly, what they see is chaos.

There was a time when graduation ceremonies symbolized the best of America -- sacrifice rewarded, opportunity realized, and families united in celebration regardless of differences.

Now too many ceremonies resemble viral outrage clips.

That should deeply concern all of us.

Because if Americans can no longer maintain dignity and order during moments meant to celebrate children and young adults, what happens when the nation faces genuine crisis?

It needs restored character.

It needs parents willing to model restraint instead of rage. Schools willing to protect the purpose of these ceremonies instead of allowing them to become ideological battlegrounds. And a culture willing to rediscover humility, respect, and self-control.

Most of all, this generation desperately needs prayer.

Pray for the graduates stepping into adulthood during one of the most divided and emotionally unstable periods in modern American history. Pray for wisdom, discernment, courage, and character. Pray for young leaders who value truth over activism, dignity over outrage, and unity over chaos.

Because the next generation is watching.

And right now, America is teaching them far more than what was written in their textbooks.
