The images from October 7 were horrifying enough. Burned homes. Bullet-riddled cars. Blood-soaked shelters. Families wiped out in a single morning. But the newly released findings from the independent Israeli Civil Commission investigation into Hamas's October 7 massacre force the world to confront something even darker: this was not merely terrorism. It was calculated human degradation on a level that many civilized people struggle to even comprehend.

For two years, investigators reviewed more than 10,000 photos and video segments, analyzed over 1,800 hours of footage, and conducted more than 430 interviews with survivors, hostages, forensic experts, first responders, and witnesses. Their conclusion is devastatingly clear: the sexual violence committed on October 7 was systematic, widespread, intentional, and integrated into Hamas's strategy of terror.

This was not chaos. It was not random brutality. It was organized evil.

And now the evidence is impossible to ignore.

The details are difficult to read because they should be difficult to read. Civilization depends on the ability to recognize evil when it reveals itself openly. Sanitizing atrocities does not honor victims. It protects perpetrators. But a warning that much of this article will be difficult to read.

At the time of the attack, one witness recounted a woman having her breast cut off before being murdered. Another described terrorists continuing to rape a woman even after she stopped moving.

These are not rumors from social media. These are corroborated testimonies supported by forensic evidence, geolocation data, photographs, video archives, and eyewitness accounts gathered through one of the largest independent investigations conducted since the massacre.

Even men were sexually abused. Hostages described humiliation, forced nudity, threats of sexual violence, and assaults carried out in captivity. Children were reportedly forced into degrading acts in front of family members. The report argues convincingly that this violence was not incidental to the attack -- it was central to it.

The purpose was humiliation. Terror. Psychological annihilation.

And yet, unbelievably, there are still people who deny it happened.

That fact alone should horrify any morally serious person.

For years, progressive activists in the West have built entire political identities around slogans like "believe women." Universities, corporations, celebrities, and activist organizations demanded that every accusation of abuse be treated with seriousness and moral urgency. Entire careers were destroyed over allegations alone.

But when Jewish women were raped, mutilated, burned, and murdered by Hamas terrorists, suddenly many of those same voices became hesitant, skeptical, or outright silent.

The silence has been deafening.

Where were the feminist marches for these women?

Where were the viral hashtags?

Where were the emotional celebrity videos demanding justice?

Too many of the loudest self-described defenders of women's rights suddenly discovered exceptions to their outrage. It appears "believe women" came with ideological fine print: unless the women are Jewish, Israeli, or politically inconvenient.

That moral collapse should permanently discredit many of the activist movements that claim to stand for human rights.

Because human rights that only apply selectively are not human rights at all. They are political weapons.

Even more disturbing has been the willingness of some Western intellectuals and media figures to cast doubt on the scale of the sexual violence despite mounting evidence. The UN itself was criticized for responding slowly and cautiously while survivors and forensic experts pleaded for acknowledgment.

Imagine telling victims of any other mass atrocity that the world needed two years of overwhelming documentation before deciding whether to believe them.

The report's title, "Silenced No More," is tragically fitting. The victims were never silent. Survivors spoke. First responders testified. Forensic teams documented the horrors. Hostages recounted abuse. The problem was not lack of evidence. The problem was that too many people did not want to hear it.

Because acknowledging the full depravity of October 7 creates a moral problem for those who have romanticized Hamas as "freedom fighters."

Freedom fighters do not gang rape women beside the bodies of their murdered husbands.

Freedom fighters do not mutilate corpses for amusement.

Freedom fighters do not sexually torture teenagers at a music festival.

Freedom fighters do not burn families alive while livestreaming it online.

What happened on October 7 was barbarism. Medieval, sadistic, genocidal barbarism.

The report matters because history matters. Documentation matters. Truth matters.

The world has seen before what happens when atrocities against Jews are minimized, denied, rationalized, or buried beneath politics. That is why these testimonies matter so deeply. They are not only evidence for future prosecutions. They are a warning about how quickly modern society can lose its moral bearings when ideology becomes more important than humanity.

They deserved truth.

And now that the truth has been documented in horrifying detail, the world faces a choice: confront it honestly, or continue pretending evil is negotiable when it aligns with fashionable politics.

History will remember which choice people made.
