In less than two weeks, the United States of America will celebrate the 250th anniversary of its independence from the British Empire, and President Donald Trump has pledged to usher in the "Golden Age of America" -- but the "mother country," as Thomas Jefferson referred to Britain, is in the midst of its own dark ages. In fact, it seems that the sun set on the British Empire many years ago.

Over the past decade, the British government has evinced an alarming degree of instability, cycling through incompetent and scandal-ridden leaders almost on a regular basis. Several prime ministers have been pressured to resign from office in the face of mounting confidence issues from within their own parties, others have resigned due to public outrage over major scandals.

Outgoing Prime Minister Keir Starmer is simply the latest to add his name to the list of leaders in and out of Downing Street's revolving door. Monday morning, after a weekend of speculation and news reports, Starmer officially announced his resignation as prime minister and as leader of the left-wing Labour Party, which currently holds a majority in Parliament.

While numerous establishment progressives in the Labour Party have praised Starmer's leadership, the party was expected to face a wipeout in the upcoming parliamentary elections under Starmer's continued leadership. One pollster confirmed that a majority of British voters supported Starmer's decision to step down following local elections last month, in which Brexit frontman Nigel Farage's Reform restrictionist Restore Britain Party, published the 219-page Rape Gang Inquiry Report (detailed by The Washington Stand here and here), which concluded that at least 250,000 British girls -- many of them adolescents at the time and some as young as 11 years of age -- had been systematically abused, raped, gang-raped, sex trafficked, and tortured by Muslim gangs.

Much of the blame for the mass rape was laid at the feet of the Labour Party, beginning with former Prime Minister Tony Blair in 1997, but Starmer himself was personally singled out for blame in the report. While serving as head of the Crown Prosecution Service (essentially the British equivalent of attorney general, responsible for overseeing criminal prosecutions for England and Wales), Starmer reportedly allowed at least 13,000 Muslim rapists go with letters of warning. No prison sentences, no fines, just warnings.

Under Starmer, Britain saw a two-tiered justice system established: Immigrants, usually Muslims, who committed vicious crimes were coddled, shielded from public backlash, and often treated as victims themselves -- victims of circumstance, victims of racism, victims of a broken immigration system, which nevertheless let them into the country in the first place and heaped taxpayer-funded benefits upon them. Meanwhile, British citizens were treated to far more severe penalties for the crimes of praying outside abortion facilities or posting memes on social media.

In 2024, just a few weeks into Starmer's premiership, 17-year-old Axel Rudakubana, the son of Rwandan immigrants, entered a Southport studio hosting a Taylor Swift-themed dance class and stabbed to death three little girls -- ages six, eight, and nine -- and injured nine other children. Once she realized that children were being attacked, event organizer Leanne Lucas tried to shield children from Rudakubana and was stabbed in her spine, head, ribs, lung, and shoulder blade. She and a dance instructor, Heidi Liddle, tried to hide the children from the butcher and sent some to escape.

One little girl, while trying to make it to a stairwell, was snatched by Rudakubana and stabbed repeatedly. An office worker in the same building, Jonathan Hayes, intervened and attempted to disarm Rudakubana and was stabbed in the leg for his efforts. When police arrived on the scene, they found Rudakubana standing over the dead body of six-year-old Bebe King. Seven-year-old Elsie Dot Stancombe was also dead when police arrived, and nine-year-old Alice da Silva Aguiar died the following day after having been hospitalized.

It is worth noting that when Starmer laid a wreath in Southport, ostensibly to mourn the victims of the attack, he did not cry, but he wept openly when announcing his resignation. In the days following the Southport massacre, protests sprang up across the country, with Brits demanding safety and security, urging immigration restrictions, and begging the government to take seriously the threat posed by Muslims. When police attempted to suppress the protests, they turned into riots. "Be in no doubt: Those who have participated in this violence will face the full force of the law," Starmer pledged, without issuing any such guarantee regarding Rudakubana and his murder of three girls. The prime minister dismissed the concerns of protestors as "far-right thuggery," labeling them a "tiny mindless minority."

When a group of 300 Muslim men armed with knives, machetes, and clubs attacked a pub in Birmingham, Starmer's police force stood by and did not intervene. Officers said that they had been tasked with suppressing "right-wing protestors," not the "Muslim patrol." More than 30 Brits were arrested for social media posts organizing or encouraging protests in the wake of the Southport stabbings. At least 17 were charged with criminal offenses. Lucy Connolly was sentenced to more than two years in prison for X posts encouraging her countrymen to protest and calling for mass deportations.

Tyler Kay was sentenced to more than three years in prison for retweeting similar content. A 55-year-old mother of three was arrested for posting "misinformation" regarding the name of the attacker. Two men were arrested and sentenced to 18 months and 20 months, respectively, for fighting off Muslim attackers who were engaged in a counter-protest that turned violent. Prosecutors frequently sought and obtained more severe sentences for British citizens by arguing that their crimes were aggravated by "racial hatred."

Since Starmer's premiership began in July of 2024, British police have made an estimated 30 arrests daily for social media posts. While Starmer and other surveillance state apologists claim that the policing targets violent threats and the organization of terrorist plots, the significant difference between the number of arrests and the number of prosecutions suggests that the exercise is simply one of chilling free speech. Predictably, the "free speech" targeted almost always appears to be criticism of the Labour government, British immigration policies, or Islam.

More recently, Starmer's government oversaw the murder of 18-year-old Brit Henry Nowak, who was stabbed to death by a knife-wielding Sikh who called the police himself and claimed that Nowak had "racially assaulted" him. Police arrived at the scene and promptly handcuffed Nowak, even as he lay bleeding to death. When the young British man tried to tell police that he had been stabbed, one of the officers replied, "I don't think you have, mate." Nowak died from his wounds seconds later. A few months after Nowak's murder, and just days after the public release of the damning bodycam footage, Belfast erupted in riots after a British man, Stephen Ogilvie, was attacked by a Sudanese immigrant, who attempted to behead Ogilvie in the street, leaving the man horribly disfigured and in a coma.

On Saturday, following the publication of the harrowing Rape Gang Inquiry Report, a Scottish man was arrested for allegedly stabbing five Muslim individuals. Starmer's response to the incident is characteristic of his entire time as prime minister: "The suspect appears to be motivated by anti-Muslim hatred," Starmer hypothesized. "I will not tolerate this -- he will face the full force of the law." Notice that, when Nowak was stabbed to death with a ceremonial Sikh knife, Starmer did not threaten the "full force of the law" against the young man's killer, Vickrum Digwa.

When Muslim gangs sadistically, brutally raped British girls in the hundreds of thousands over the course of decades, Starmer did not threaten the "full force of the law" against them -- even though he himself actually had the power, as the nation's top prosecutor, to wield the full force of the law. He treated them to the opposite: warning letters for the crime of raping children. When a Sudanese barbarian hacked away at a British man's face and neck, Starmer did not respond with the "full force of the law."

The only people Starmer has targeted for criminalization and prosecution have been his own countrymen, British citizens who have dared to love their nation and value the safety of their children. Whenever Muslims or foreign insurgents have stabbed, butchered, run their cars over, or raped native Brits, Starmer and his entourage have urged "caution," asking the public not to "jump to conclusions" about the motive of a killer crying out, "Allahu Akbar," or not to "speculate" about the national origin of people with names like Mohammed Abed Mahmood or Kinyar Mugisha. White British people are not given the same treatment: instead, their memes and social media posts are treated as terrorist acts, the color of their skin is immediately and openly handed over to the media for publication, and their motives are always presumed to be "racial hatred."

While Starmer's regime may have been the apotheosis of this two-faced principle, wreaking havoc and misery upon the British people, the system has been in place for years. Even though the Conservative Party (colloquially known as the Tories, often the largest rival to Labour) handling of Brexit negotiations. May's successor, Conservative Boris Johnson, likewise only spent three years in Downing Street. Although campaigning heavily on Brexit rhetoric and immigration restriction, Johnson failed to follow through on his promises, with net migration into the U.K. roughly doubling under Johnson's tenure.

The controversial PM was nearly forced to resign in May of 2022 after it was revealed that he and other Conservative Party leaders had openly flouted the COVID-19 restrictions that they had imposed on the nation, hosting debauched private parties, even one the night before Queen Elizabeth II was forced to sit alone, due to COVID restrictions, at the funeral of her husband, Prince Philip. Johnson's premiership came to an end two months later, when it was revealed that he promoted a Tory while having and keeping secret full knowledge of reported sexual assault incidents regarding the MP. More than one-third of Johnson's own government resigned in protest, forcing Johnson to leave office.

Tory Liz Truss succeeded Johnson and resigned after a mere 50 days. Truss was in turn succeeded by former Chancellor of the Exchequer Rishi Sunak, who was defeated one year and 255 days later in a landslide by Labour in the 2024 elections, when the Tories lost their longstanding majority. Starmer is likely to be replaced by Labour MP Andy Burnham, a self-described international socialist and the former mayor of Manchester.

Despite the fact that calls for Starmer's resignation increased following Labour's widespread defeat by Reform in local elections earlier this year and concerns raised by Labour members over the party's immigration policy, Burnham is likely to be more of the same. He has vocally opposed immigration caps and measures to identify illegal immigrants, although the rising Labour star has moderated his rhetoric since May, no doubt in a bid to obtain the premiership.

Britain no longer resembles the great empire that once ruled the world, the same empire against which American colonists fought for independence 250 years ago. The British government now is little more than a failed state, reminiscent of the Soviet Union after Joseph Stalin's death, with ambitious, conniving politicians constantly scheming and plotting to replace one another at the top of the heap, although the policies of each of the manifold, short-lived leaders are difficult to differentiate, instead forming an amorphous mass of globalist, post-national, international socialist ideals and platitudes punctuated by either indifference toward or outright hatred against white British citizens.

It need not be so. The same blood that ran in the veins of George Washington, John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, Patrick Henry, Benjamin Franklin, Samuel Adams, John Hancock, and the countless patriots and heroes who fought alongside and under their commanders to claim independence for their sovereign nation courses still in the veins of the English today.

The Saxon fervor that drove Alfred the Great to wage war against invading Norsemen and his grandson, Athelstan, to become the first King of England burns still in the hearts of British patriots. The rebel barons who pressed the narcissistic King John to sign the Magna Carta and guarantee the rights of Englishmen are the many-times-great grandfathers of the men and women populating England today. With hearts of fire and wills of steel, the British people once ruled the waves and brought civilization and order to much of the world. If that same fire is again enkindled and that same steel tempered, the British can once again have their own nation.

Americans may look to the failed state of Britain today and be grateful that they elected Trump to the White House. Already, the American border is secure, and a deportation campaign is underway to ensure that the U.S. does not suffer the same fate as Britain. Former Vice President Kamala Harris, who was dubbed "border czar" and tasked with managing the nation's borders, instead flooded the country with at least 10 million illegal immigrants, many of whom proceeded to embark on a campaign of rape, murder, and other crimes.

The horrors of the Muslim rape gangs that Starmer and his allies persistently hid, enabled, and protected could have been visited upon America at the same scale -- or much larger -- had American patriots not rejected at the ballot box those who cower in fear before the term "racist," but think nothing of the rape and murder of their nation. God blessed the U.S. with men willing to stand against the destruction of their homes and men and women willing to vote for those courageous leaders. May He bless Britain with the same.
