The Left's Latest Smear: "Christofascism"

Political debate has reached the point where words no longer mean what they once did. "Racist." "Nazi." "Threat to democracy." "Fascist." These labels are increasingly thrown around not to persuade, but to silence. They have become rhetorical weapons designed to end conversations rather than begin them.

Texas Democratic Senate candidate James Talarico's latest comments are a perfect example.

Appearing on Texas Impact's Weekly Witness, Talarico claimed that laws preventing minors from receiving puberty blockers, cross-sex hormones, and irreversible gender-transition surgeries are products of "Christofascism." He grouped restrictions on pediatric gender medicine together with Texas abortion laws, arguing they all flow from the same supposedly dangerous religious ideology.

That accusation deserves far more scrutiny than it has received.

After all, if protecting children from permanent medical procedures is "fascism," then what exactly isn't?

The first flaw in Talarico's argument is his assumption that opposition to pediatric gender-transition procedures is exclusively religious. It simply isn't.

Some of the world's most respected medical authorities have dramatically reconsidered these treatments--not because of Christianity, but because of the evidence.

Over the past several years, countries once considered pioneers in "gender-affirming care" have begun reversing course. Nations such as Sweden, Finland, Norway, and the United Kingdom have significantly restricted or reevaluated puberty blockers and hormone treatments for minors after systematic reviews concluded that the evidence supporting these interventions was remarkably weak while the potential risks were substantial.

These are hardly theocracies.

Apprently, according to Talarico's logic, Scandinavian health officials are now part of a "Christofascist" movement as well.

That illustrates just how absurd the label has become.

The second flaw is even more troubling.

Children cannot legally purchase alcohol, buy cigarettes, gamble, or sign binding contracts because society recognizes they often lack the maturity to fully understand lifelong consequences. In many states they cannot even get a tattoo without parental consent.

Yet we're told they possess sufficient maturity to consent to procedures that may permanently alter fertility, sexual function, bone development, and healthy organs.

That contradiction should concern every parent regardless of political affiliation.

This debate is not about denying compassion to children struggling with gender dysphoria.

It is about asking whether vulnerable adolescents should undergo irreversible medical interventions while their brains, bodies, and identities are still developing.

Those are legitimate questions.

Labeling everyone who asks them as "fascists" is not an argument--it is an attempt to avoid having one.

The irony is impossible to ignore.

The same political movement that insists we "follow the science" during one controversy often dismisses scientific caution when it challenges its preferred narrative.

The same people who argue teenagers cannot responsibly choose their student loans somehow believe they can consent to sterilizing drugs or surgeries with lifelong consequences.

Consistency has become optional.

The third problem with Talarico's statement is his use of the word "Christofascism."

refers to authoritarian governments that centralize power, suppress dissent, control institutions, and eliminate opposition through (https://www.prophecynewswatch.com)

Parents advocating caution before permanently altering a child's healthy body bear little resemblance to that definition.

Disagreement is not fascism.

f Facebook (https://www.facebook.com/ProphecyNewsWatch)

Voting is not fascism.

Protecting minors is not fascism.

The casual misuse of these historically loaded terms diminishes the horrors endured under actual fascist regimes while poisoning honest public discourse today.

Perhaps most revealing is that Talarico's criticism ultimately targets Christianity itself.

By attaching "Christo" to "fascism," he suggests biblical convictions about human identity are inherently authoritarian and dangerous.

Yet Scripture teaches something remarkably different.

The Christian understanding of humanity begins with the belief that every person is created intentionally in the image of God. Human dignity does not come from self-definition or personal feelings but from our Creator.

That conviction leads many Christians to oppose irreversible interventions on children--not because they hate anyone, but because they believe the body is not an accident to be medically corrected according to changing cultural trends.

Reasonable people can disagree about public policy.

But disagreement does not equal hatred.

Nor should sincere religious convictions automatically be dismissed as extremism.

America desperately needs thoughtful conversations about children experiencing gender dysphoria. Families deserve compassion. Medical professionals deserve the freedom to discuss evidence honestly. Parents deserve the right to ask difficult questions without being branded extremists.

Instead, too many politicians reach for inflammatory labels.

Calling child-protection laws "Christofascism" may generate applause from ideological allies, but it does nothing to address the serious medical, ethical, and psychological questions surrounding these treatments.

In fact, it reveals something deeper about our political culture.

When one side can no longer defend a position on its merits, it often attacks the character of those asking the questions.

Protecting children should never require an apology.

And defending caution before permanently altering a minor's body should never require defending yourself against accusations of fascism.

If that's the standard for political debate today, then it isn't Christianity that has lost its way--it's our public conversation.
