The Pastors Who Want To Rewrite Christianity

For generations, Christians have faced criticism from outside the Church. But increasingly, some of the sharpest attacks on foundational Christian doctrine are coming from inside the pulpit itself. The latest example comes from United Church of Christ pastor Anna Flowers of the United Church in Walpole, Massachusetts, who recently declared that the biblical teaching that Jesus is the only path to salvation "makes no sense."

Just weeks ago, many Christians were stunned when Yvette Flunder, senior pastor of the City of Refuge United Church of Christ in Oakland, criticized portions of the Bible as discriminatory and suggested Christians should effectively "rip out" verses they dislike and replace them with a so-called "Third Testament." Now, another minister has stepped forward with a message that directly contradicts one of Christianity's most central claims: that salvation comes through Jesus Christ alone.

Flowers argues that when Jesus declared in John 14:6, "I am the way, the truth and the life," He was not speaking literally. According to her, Christianity is simply one authentic spiritual path among many. In her view, there are multiple roads to God, and moral or ethical living -- regardless of belief -- is enough to secure eternity.

But _____, _____, _____, _____

Jesus did not say He was "a" way. He said He was "the" way. The distinction matters. The apostles reinforced the same message repeatedly. In Acts 4:12, Peter boldly declared, "There is no other name under heaven given among men by which we must be saved." Christianity has always stood apart because of this exclusive claim -- not out of arrogance, but because truth by nature is exclusive.

A Christian comedian once mocked the idea of universalism with a simple illustration: if you want to fly to New York, you cannot simply board any random plane and assume every route leads to the same destination. Truth matters. Direction matters. The plane matters. Yet increasingly, some pastors are preaching a spiritual version of exactly that confusion -- assuring people that sincerity is enough regardless of what they believe.

Flowers attempted to defend her theology by arguing that Jesus taught believers to love and care for their neighbors, including those of other faiths. That part is absolutely true. Christians are called to show compassion, kindness and mercy to all people. But somewhere in modern progressive theology, a dangerous leap has occurred: from loving non-believers to declaring that belief itself no longer matters.

That is not Christianity. It is moral relativism wrapped in spiritual language.

The heart of the Gospel has never been that humanity can earn heaven through good behavior. In fact, Scripture repeatedly teaches the opposite. The Bible declares that salvation is not achieved through works, morality or personal goodness, because no human being is perfect. Christianity teaches that mankind needs redemption precisely because human goodness is insufficient.

Yet the belief Flowers promotes reflects the growing theology of modern culture: be kind, be tolerant, be ethical, and heaven will sort itself out in the end. It is a message that removes the necessity of repentance, the cross and even Christ Himself.

And that raises an uncomfortable question: if there are many valid paths to God, then why did Jesus need to die at all?

This is a serious issue.

Many Christians watching these developments are increasingly alarmed not simply because of theological disagreements, but because confusion from spiritual leaders carries enormous consequences. When pastors publicly dismiss or reinterpret foundational teachings of Scripture, many believers -- especially younger Christians -- begin to question whether anything in the Bible can truly be trusted at all.

The issue is not whether Christians should love people of different beliefs. They should. The issue is whether pastors have the authority to rewrite doctrines that have stood at the center of Christianity for 2,000 years.

Flowers holds respected academic credentials, including a Master of Divinity from Candler School of Theology at Emory University, and she has served in ministry for years. But credentials do not determine truth. Throughout history, many highly educated theologians have drifted from biblical orthodoxy while claiming to improve or modernize the faith.

The growing trend inside some progressive churches appears clear: doctrines that offend modern culture are being softened, reinterpreted or abandoned altogether. Sin becomes misunderstanding. Repentance becomes self-discovery. Salvation becomes universal. And Jesus becomes not Savior, but simply one spiritual teacher among many.

But Christianity without the uniqueness of Christ is no longer Christianity at all.

Christians should not respond with hatred or personal attacks. They should pray for Flowers and others embracing similar teachings. But they should also recognize the seriousness of what is happening. A church that loses confidence in the authority of Scripture eventually loses the Gospel itself.

And once a church no longer believes Jesus meant what He said, it becomes difficult to know what -- if anything -- remains sacred anymore. You can watch a portion of her sermon here:
